Up and Down in Market Values on the Stock Exchange.

NEW YORK, Feb. 7.—To-day's bank statement gave the bears an excuse to hammer prices without opposition of moment. The market shaded off till the close, which was, however, fairly steady and dull at insignificant changes, as a rule, from last night's figures.

BLOWING UP A WRECK.

The Yantic Destroys the Remains of the Viscaya.

From the New York Times.
The lonesome-looking stick which was once the mainmast of the steamer Viscaya, and which has been menacing navigation off Barnegat since the fatal collision of that craft with the coaler Hargrave, is now no more. Its remains, in the shape and size of toothpicks, have been blown up and scattered to the four winds. The Yantic did it.

Upon leaving the Hook the improvised wrecking vessel steamed to a point about eight miles off Barnegat. Lookouts were aloft to find the black whistling buoy which marked the grave of the two vessels, and when this was found active preparations were begun. From the spot where preparations were made to lower the torpedo Barnegat Lighthouse bore west three-eighths south seven and one-half miles. The stern of the Hargrave lay in 11 1/2 fathoms, about 300 yards north-west.

Two boats from the Yantic then put out and torpedoes were let down by guide ropes to the deck of the Viscaya. Here they were placed, as nearly as could be estimated, close against the heel of the mainmast which has been sticking above water since the wreck occurred. The torpedo consisted of a cast-iron shell cylindrical in form, three feet long and one foot in diameter. From the head projected an iron tube into which an electric wire passed. The tube was fitted with a plug to keep out the water. The wire then passed through a papier mache cylinder nearly to the other end of the torpedo, where it connected with a very thin platinum wire.

Fine gunpowder was placed next to the gun cotton, and above that was gunpowder of a coarser grain. One hundred pounds comprised the entire charge. When the torpedo was close against the heel of the mast the boats were rowed to a point 500 feet distant, the officer in charge meanwhile paying out the wire from a reel in his hand. One end of the wire was attached to the torpedo and the other to a hand dynamo. When the electric current was sent to the torpedo the platinum wire became heated to a whiteness, the gun cotton ignited and the torpedo, weighing 325 pounds, exploded. The mast was snipped into splinters.

HE WATCHED THE AUTOPSY.

A Cold-Blooded Husband Sees His Dead Wife Cut Up.

From the St. Louis Star.

A coroner sees many curious sights. A Deputy Coroner was telling of a circumstance that came under his notice recently that surpasses anything ever heard of in the way of heartless indifference. He was called to investigate a case where a man's wife had died very suddenly. It was plainly a case of heart failure but the husband insisted on an autopsy. He not only wanted the autopsy but he wanted to see it performed. The body was placed on a table and the doctors began work. The husband watched every movement very closely. Finally the liver and heart were exposed and the heart was found to be greatly enlarged. The husband, more deeply interested than ever, stepped forward and took hold of the heart with his fingers. "It made my blood run cold," said the deputy, "and I pushed the man away." He seemed to resent the coroner's action very much and insisted on knowing what caused his wife's death. The doctor explained that it was caused by an enlargement of the heart. "Wall, by thunder!" mused the man, "I don't understand that. I supposed a big heart made folks generous like, but that woman was the dumbest, stingiest critter I ever see."
